PAIR FROM PALO PINTO

The tale of how a gold rush started up Mammon Canon came back to Palo Pinto, where it began, in fragments, much the same as a herd of cattle is rounded up on the home range after a stampede. It was pieced together and calmed into a reasonable narrative by Nip Fowler, who is the Palo Pino correspondent for All Existing Newspapers. Here are the facts: There was Ditsey Forncrook, prospector;

there was "Pire-pox." a stranger burden-ed with many devils; and there was Frok Muldoon, the Second, a nuster of men, guns, and trails. These three carried out drama of a few words.

Ditsey was down to the rinds and gristle of his last stake and looking for a "pardner" to go up the Mammon with him for the gold cure. No one offered until "Fire-pox" drifted late Pale Plate. Fellowing is Nip Fewler's description of the

"He had no word to say about who or what he was, but he looked bad to usstep behind and he'd leap about like a cat caught snoopin' what knows better. He was pocked. Oh, yes, he was pockeddeep and red as harvest moons. So we named him. His eyes were busy and ere yellow. His ears were pointed like his reeth, and his lies were paper-thin that didn't lay easy, but Ditsey was looking for a pardner and didn't stipulate is half, and when 'Fire-box' said he'd go, Datsey said 'huen.' Two nays after they pulled up the carron with three burros."

but he could work and travel and handle packs. He used a bivouse for cuting and about the creepings and hidings of the yellow virgin who makes hat lequins of the that their joint capacity would start a rush up the ennou. And he was right.

One dawn when Palo Pinto was three ceeks behind, Intsey opened his eyes to find that his pardner was beyond the progress. A few minutes afterward, "Firepox" crawled in. Wis eyes were as big us-He jerked up when he saw that the other
